Background

The Gen-Ka is a predator native to the sixth planet of the Tarawa-5 system. It is a fairly large, worm-like creature. It has a brownish-pink segmented body, a large, fanged mouth, and four tentacles towards its front end. Each tentacle is 2 to 3 meters long and has a Strength of 40. Each is also covered with chitinous barbs. The creature's skin secretes a strange, foul-odored oily substance. The smell emitted from this can cause intense sickness (Roll a Chemical SMR or vomit for 3D20 seconds, if within 10m). This substance provides the Gen-Ka with protection against acids, fire, cold, and grappling attacks (which suffer a -20 to maintain holds).

Nature of the Encounter

The only tactic really used by the Gen-Ka is to track its prey via ground vibrations (200m radius, 98% chance). Once ready, it will burst through the ground, gaining initiative against those who fail an Aggression check (with a +5 bonus). It will then attack the closest target with all four tentacles and its bite. If all five attacks hit, the target is considered grabbed (Treat as a Body Hold, Strength -65 to break free). The Gen-ka will retreat underground with its prey, move 10-20 m away, and coil its body around the victim, inflicting 1D10+9 points of temporary damage every three seconds. Once the victim is unconscious, the Gen-Ka will drag him back to its lair to feed.

Habitat

The Gen-Ka is a subterranean creature, found mainly in grassy plains, but they are sometimes found under light forests. They dwell in small, self-made caverns that reek (Chemical SMR, with failure resulting in such intense sickness that the victim is incapacitated for the duration of exposure +10D6 minutes after), and are littered with bones.
